America's Labor Market Information System

America's Labor Market Information System (ALMIS) is a dynamic system that produces high-quality, standardized labor market information and tools in a variety of media and formats for use by job seekers, employers, and workforce development professionals. This collaborative effort among the States and the Employment and Training Administration is an integral part of the information infrastructure that underpins the nationwide workforce investment system. ALMIS has Federal, State and local components which engage in data collection and analysis, research and development, product development, direct service delivery, technical assistance, and capacity-building.

Its products and services include:

- career and occupational information available online in the resource room of a local One-Stop Center to help individuals identify potential jobs and occupations
- customized labor market information from a variety of sources (States, Bureau of Labor Statistics, Bureau of the Census, Bureau of Economic Analysis, etc.) to help employers develop strategies for recruiting, hiring, and retaining workers
- grants to States to help them develop new data-collection techniques so that training dollars can be targeted to high-demand occupations
- America's Career Kit, a group of national online tools for individuals and employers
- O*NET, the replacement for the Dictionary of Occupational Titles, which provides a common occupational language to help workers and employers connect more easily
- the Labor Market Information Institute, a comprehensive national facility providing high-quality training to labor market information professionals throughout the country
- agreed-upon standards and content requirements, developed by a State consortium, for a common national data set of labor market information
- ongoing research and development to produce new consumer tools and ways of measuring or predicting labor market forces
